BROKEN HEARTS.

There are broken hearts in the world today,
Though smiling faces hide them!
They pass and repass on the old highway,
With stifled grief beside them.
The wan white face of the woman who knows
That she must wander apart
With the soul within her not even gray glows,
With a proud but broken heart.

There are broken hearts in the world today,
Beneath white fare and laces
Dark December grows at those hearts, though
May
Smiles in the dauntless faces.
The restless eyes of the man we see
By day in the busy mart,
Look down in the night through his soul, and he Looks into a broken heart.

There are broken hearts in the world today,
For all the eyes's laughter!
The warm hearts that were red and growing gray
Have fled and 'south west after
But the sun comes up and the world goes round
And all of us play our parts,
But over and well as under the ground
There are dead and broken hearts!
—John Brown McCann in New York Mercury

The Rights of Children.

A bright little girl of 11 years was out on the sidewalk in Brooklyn with her brother, who was 6. He left her for a few minutes and she started to go along some place in the street to the corner, when an ice wagon ran over and killed her. Her father sued the ice company for damages and got a verdict. The company carried the case to the court of appeals, where its lawyers claimed that it was gross negligence for a parent to allow a little child to go alone the space of one lot on the sidewalk without some competent person to take care of it. The court decides that it is not negligence to do so, and holds the company liable in damages. Here is what Judge Earl says on the subject:

Hundreds of young children are permitted with general safety, and must be permitted to play, to amuse themselves on the sidewalks, and they cannot always be attended by persons of discretion. The highest prudence would doubtless require that they should be so guarded, but it cannot be said as matter of law that ordinary prudence forbids that a bright child, 4 years old, properly instructed and cautioned, should go unattended on a sidewalk for diversion.—Washington Star.

The Topographical Instinct.

A deep thinking Scotch skipper, seeing a whole flock of solitary birds steadily south for hours, and not deviating a point from his course, said, "A whale will often leave the pack and set out all alone in search of warmer seas, as this one seems to have done. What guides these birds? We can't know, but, but not only whales, even seals seem positively to carry a compass in their brains.

Many animals and birds possess a sense which enables them to find their way unerringly over sea or land, where there is no, so far as we can see, nothing to guide them. Dogs, cats, horses and birds have found their way back from great distances to their homes, although they have been removed from it in a way to deprive them of all assistance from the organs of sight.

The carrier pigeon, for instance, is carried hundreds of miles from its loft. It has travel at that distance in a basket under the seat of a railroad car; but when it is thrown up, it circles about for a few minutes, and then decides unhesitatingly on the exact line of flight which brings it to its loft, though it may never have been in the country before.

The explanation which says the bird has "the homing instinct" is as lame as that which ascribes to the bird the power of scenting its loft a hundred miles away; the Scotch skipper's is much better. The bird "carries a compass in its brains."

A writer in Leisure Hour says that a collie pup, 7 months old, was brought from Inverary to a relation by rail, and from Aberdeen to Banchory by another railroad. The puppy ran away from Banchory and found its way back in a few days to Inverary, across a wooded, hilly country, with one river and several streams to get over.

The writer calls the sense by which animals are guided in finding their way the topographical instinct—which is a name, but not an explanation.—Youth's Companion.

Too Much for the Indian.

These military anecdotes remind me of a story I heard Gen. Sheridan tell once, and which I do not remember having seen in print before. The general at the time was in command of some western troops fighting the Indians. A band of the latter had made a sudden attack on a detachment of his men, but fortunately they had a mountain howitzer mounted on a mule. Not having time to take it off and put it in position, they hoisted up and blazed away at the Indians. The load was so heavy that the mule and all went tumbling down the hill toward the savages, who, not understanding that kind of fighting, took to their heels. Afterward one of them was captured, and when asked by Sheridan why he ran, replied:

"Big Injun not afraid of little or big guns, but when white man fire whole jackass at Injun, he don't know what to do."—New York Tribune.

Dogan Life Over Again.

I rode up town from the court with a man who is now prospering in a respectable business position in New York, and who holds the respect and confidence of his employers, who, when I was in the far west a dozen years back, was in state prison on the Pacific coast for forgery. He had been employed in a commercial house, had been bitten by the mania for stock gambling, and landed behind bars. When he was released he came east and began life over again, and his record shows, so closely as any record can do that, that he gathered wisdom from chastisement, and really commenced a new life with his new name.—Pittsburg Bulletin.

Horses on Snowshoes.

Snowshoes have been worn for years by horses on the Oroville and Quincy mail route during the winter months. It would be impossible for them to travel over the deep snows without their aid. A horse shod in questioned to wearing them will travel five and six miles an hour, where it would be impossible to go that distance in a week without them. The shoes are made of thin steel plate, about nine by eleven inches, fastened to the hoofs with chains. The horses are shod with four half shoes, which are

"AUNT MAGS" FUNERAL.

THE COWBOY'S GENUINE GRIEF AND DELICACY OF FELING

A Wild Westerner Has a Heart as Well as Others of Him Clothed Sometimes Shedding Tears with a Comrade in Trouble.

Much has been written regarding cowboy life on the plains, and much of that writing has been so magnified that the uncompromiting are led to believe that the cowboy is a veritable terror, whose glory lies in riotous conduct and terrorizing the countenance of fellow beings. Such belief is exceedingly erroneous, for, aside from many other noble traits, the cowboy has a heart as sympathetic as a female. This week near Trail Creek the other day, when Lon, Texas Lonny and his gang were herding cattle about thirty miles to the north of this little place in the region of the Horsethief river, a cattle correspondent from Livingstone, M. T. Lester is a New Yorker, and came to the northwest some years ago with his wife and a other. Every cow puncher on the plains knew "Aunt Mag," as Long Tom's mother was familiarly known. She always had a kind word for them, and her devout Christianity had won respect from every one who had ever struck Long Tom's ranch. Letter a lengthy form had given him the sobriquet of Long Tom, and he had worked his way up from a common herder to captain of a gang.

"AUNT MAG'S DEAD."

One day he was in the vicinity of Moselshell with a heavy herd bound for Billings. Night was drawing near, and the boys had just got the herd ready to ride down the cattle and point for camp. Away to the west appeared a horseman riding for the herd. Although not mounted on a horse, Long Tom knew the animal, an extra he had at the ranch.

"Some one's comin' on, Dick," he said, "there's somthin' wrong to home."

The horse drew nearer, and the rider was recognized as Lester's wife. Bareheaded she galloped up and almost gasped for breath as she said, "Mother sick—dying."

Long Tom's eyes fell, and as his hand threw his horse's mane under the bridle rein he called to his mate, Dick Morton, will take my place," and he rode for home, his wife and himself were off at a gallop.

After the cattle had been ridden down for the night Morton, who had been assigned to take charge of the herd, called the men together. Morton was from some place in Ohio near Hudson in the Western reserve, and is a college graduate. The roaming life of the cowboy fascinated him, and he's discarded his diploma for a lariat.

"Boys," he said, "we've got to do somthing. Here's Tom out here on a desperate ride with his mother dead, and Aunt Mag was a humble woman. Her emotion choked back anything further he desired to say.

"Fellers," it was "Jersey Bill" who (nearly every man in the gang had a nickname), "Shorty's right. We gotta do her a decent funyu' for Tom. We'll Somethin' right out for Billings, an' get a coffin, an' we'll tie an' bury her some way."

A MERRY MIND WITH A COFFIN.

The suggestion met with favor, and Billings, the nearest point where an undertaker was obtainable, was over twenty miles to the southward. It was agreed that there for a coffin. "And at 2 o'clock in the night "Jersey Bill" was tightening up the girth on his pony.

"I'll take Joe Keller's pony with me to carry the coffin, and I'll be back before sun up."

As he swung into the saddle his companions crowded around and passed money into his hands.

"Get the best, Bill; Aunt Mag's worth it," was the parting admonition from his companions. All night that little band of cowboys sat around the fire and reluctantly took their turn at picket duty around the herd, as all were anxious to offer suggestions for Aunt Mag's funeral.

Day was just breaking when Jersey Bill showed up with a neat, cloth covered coffin, which was taken to Lester's ranch at once. Long Tom was stunned as he was just preparing to start on a mission similar to that of Jersey Bill. The remains of Aunt Mag were tenderly placed in the coffin by Mrs. Lester and her husband.

That afternoon a burial took place—such a burial is seldom or ever. Willing hands had dug a grave on a knoll north of Lester's cabin. The pastor, pallbearers and mourners were cowboys, and the sympathy were manifested came from deep down in the heart. Prior to depositing the coffined form of all that was mortal of Aunt Mag in the grave, Morton made brief remarks, eulogizing the good deeds of the deceased. Every head in the group that stood around the grave was uncovered and the tears of every eye glistened with moisture. Drops of liquid crystal rolled down Jersey Bill's cheeks as he stooped over to aid in depositing the coffin in the grave. Although devoid of the pomp and formality of a funeral in the midst of civilization, no more sincere, sorrowing mourners ever gathered around a bier than the crowd of cowboys that laid Aunt Mag to rest.—Chicago Herald.

Current of the Sound.

One night about fifteen years ago Mason Clark had his schooner at anchor in Port Townsend bay. While he was sleeping the wind came up and loosened the vessel from its anchorage. It drifted all night, and in the morning he found himself lying quietly at the mouth of Campbell creek, in British waters, in front of Blaine. He had drifted sixty miles by wind and tide, and over that same course the largest ships can sail without a tug.

About seven or eight years ago one cold winter day John Gesher went aboard a sloop which belonged to Mr. Hennessey and was anchored in Birch bay. He turned the anchor with the intention of bringing the sloop ashore, when a strong east wind caught her and she became unmanageable, at least, to him, and so he floated about for several days on the gulf with no fire and nothing to eat but one raw goose, which he shot when it was delicious. He finally brought up in Bellingham, on Vancouver island, only about sixty miles from where he started. In just one week from the time the skipper Hogarth left home on board the sloop he was back in Samishmoo, arriving on New Year's Day, much to the gratification of his friends, who had given him up for lost.—Blaine (W. T.) Journal.

Gap of the letters used on the stage from near Albany has a heavy moustache. People who have encountered the horse and the remarkable growth of hair on its upper lip say they never saw anything to equal it.

We Escape a Scrap Book.

I hear from Spain that the German support only looks to advantage on foot. He "sits heavy" on a Hackbiscuit horse short. With this the legs are long. His figure, therefore, is an unpromising one for riding, the knees advancing far toward the horse's head, and the legs and thighs forming an acute angle. He has given up saber and lance clanking, does not eat much and shows temperate habits of tea. His face was worn and showed fatigue when he was in Italy. Every morning and evening packets of papers were placed on a desk in his sitting room. He glanced over all that was about himself, and w ain he had done so paragraphs of which he was the subject were cut out by a secretary and pasted into a scrap book.—London Truth.

BLONDIN, THE ROPE WALKER

He Discusses the "High Art" and Tells Some Experiences.

A rope walker at life a good, born and not made. I myself began to toddle along a rope when I was only 4 years old and in my 8th year I gave a special exhibition on the high rope before the King of Turin. It is a usual thing to do for the apprentices in a circus to be taught rope walking among their other lessons, but only a few of the very best have had the mechanism of the art. The usual system of teaching is for the pupil walk along a narrow board the width of which is daily decreased until it is barely thicker than an ordinary rope. Patronizing and encouraging gracefully attitudes are taught, exercises, and finally the pupil is ready to go to the rope itself.

The apparatus which a beginning rope walker is supposed to use is simple enough, but in reality it has to be carefully tried and arranged with the greatest care. The rope is generally fastened with a double cable, and is secured with the best manila rope, and about an inch and three quarters in diameter. It is several hundred yards in length, and the end may be seen. The rope I took I found rather too large, would rose and which a rope could be twelve inches. The manilas are twelve inches, the rope is strained until the rope is straight as a line. It takes me, as a rule, a little less than a minute to get the rope adjusted to my satisfaction. The balancing pole is made of ash, is about twenty six feet long, and weighs some forty or fifty pounds.

I am often asked how I contrive to keep from falling off the rope, and if I feel at any time giddy. I can answer decidedly in the negative. When walking I look some eighteen or twenty feet ahead. I hear and whistle softly or hum some old tune. I am totally free from giddiness. I feel without effort, and I am always at home. I perform my feats in the open air, without effort, and I am always at home. I perform my feats in the open air, without effort, and I am always at home. I perform my feats in the open air,

HARRISON AND MORTON.

Brilliant Reception to the Vice President-Elect surpassing Anything Ever Before in Indianapolis.

INDIANAPOLIS, Ind. Dec 14 Mrs. Harrison and Mrs. Morton passed a rather quiet day The rain was somewhat lessened on account of a sore throat. Mrs Morton took the train at noon for a short visit Mrs. Morton and Mrs. Harrison received a number of callers during the day

Vice President-elect and Mrs Morton will leave for home at five o'clock to morrow afternoon, stopping over Sunday at Buffalo Mrs Morton is anxious to return to her children, and is feeling improved

The Public Receptions

Commenced tonight at Tomlinson Hall to vice President-elect and Mrs. Morton, by the citizens of Indianapolis, was the most brilliant night of the kind that ever occurred in this city. Mrs Morton was taken home indisposed. The great hall was tastefully decorated shortly after 8 o'clock Mr Morton entered escorted by Mrs. Harrison and followed by Gen. Harrison escorting Mrs. Brackinridge, and took their places in the center of a long line of distinguished guests. Mrs. Harrison wore a brown silk with blue lace, Mrs McKee a steel blue with brown passementerie

The gentlemen wore Prince Albertis. The guests stood in a line with Mr. Morton and Gen Harrison at the head and the crowd passed before them, two abreast, and shook hands with the President and Vice President-elect and others. The stream extended far down through the hall and into the street nearly two blocks distant The police kept the people from breaking into the line and everything passed off in the most orderly manner It estimated that 10,000 people passed through the hall. Not all had a chance to shake hands with the President and Vice President-elect Two or three thousand people did not get into the hall.

FEDERATION OF LABOR.

Proceedings at Yesterday's Session

ST. LOUIS, Dec 14 At today's session of the Federation of Labor the committee on constitution reported. The meeting of the Federation is fixed for the second Tuesday of December, to change section 5 article 4 to read so as to bar from affiliation with the Federation any central labor body that admits Knights of Labor or any organization antagonistic to the Federation After several speeches, Mr. Holler, of Chicago, offered a substitute resolution which excludes bodies hostile to trade organization affiliating with the Federation. The resolution was discussed and Mr Holler's substitute was finally adopted

President Gompers then put the original proposition, much to the amusement of those who had just voted for Mr Holler's substitute which, they supposed, was a substitute for the committee's proposition, and not an amendment to it President Gompers, however, decided that it was offered as an amendment, and proceeded to put the original proposition to a vote The liberals rallied their forces and under Mr Foster's leadership defeated it, thus preventing an open rupture between the Knights and the Federation The question of fixing the salary of the President at $1,700 per annum, increased $500, was postponed.

CABINET GOSSIP.

Mr. Blaine and the Secretaryship of State.

The Principals Refuse to Talk on the Matter.

NEW YORK, Dec. 14. The Press says editorially that it has the best authority for stating positively that Mr. Blaine has not been offered the portfolio of State by President-elect Harrison. The Press adds that the "inspiration" of one or two other positions in Mr. Harrison's Cabinet has been denied upon no authoritative announcement of the decision of the President-elect has yet been made.

The Sun also says that at a late hour this morning it could get no good authority that President-elect Harrison has tendered the portfolio of Secretary of State to Mr. J. G. Blaine and that Mr. Blaine has accepted the appointment and that the matter will be formally announced shortly. Mr. Blaine will be in Boston within a few hours. They are brief and highly complimentary.

Information from Blaine is to a considerable extent.

The Telegram publishes an interview with ex-Senator Platt, with regard to the report that Mr. Blaine has been tendered and had accepted the portfolio of Secretary of State. Mr. Platt characterized the report as "rot," and added that he did not believe that Mr. Blaine had accepted the portfolio or that Gen. Harrison had tendered it to him. He said the story had been started by the correspondent of a Cincinnati paper and then it was sent to every journal in New York but that it was only published by a few.

Mr. Blaine Refuses to Talk

BOSTON, Dec. 14 An Augusta, Maine, special says that Mr. Blaine declines to give any information as to his being tendered the Secretary ship of State. Mr. Joseph H. Manley states that he does not believe General Harrison has tendered the position to Mr. Blaine, although he has always believed that it would be tendered and that Mr. Blaine would accept.

Nothing Known of it in Washington

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14 None of Mr. Blaine's friends here know anything about the offer of the appointment as Secretary of State. Representative Dingley said he had not heard of the offer being made and had not looked for it for the two or three weeks yet He did not doubt the report but was of the best impression that, but merely because he had got no word of it. If the offer is true a title he did not think either Mr Blaine or Gen. Harrison would say anything about it. At least he thought Mr. Blaine would wait of the matter first to his friends here "But if the report is not true," he said, "I think it only little in advance of the truth The only way I can think of," he added, after a moment's thought, "that an authoritative statement to that effect might get to the public, is that Mr Blaine may have telegraphed the fact to some friend in New York who immediately spoke it. I have never had any doubt in the matter would be tried in Mr Blaine, but did not expect it in just the time it has come.

General Harrison Refuses to be Interviewed

INDIANAPOLIS, Ind., Dec 14 For a time this afternoon Gen Harrison's house was fairly girdled by newspaper correspondents who were in a flutter over the report published in New York to the effect that Mr Blaine had been offered and accepted the state portfolio. Gen Harrison, when asked, replied with considerable emphasis: "It makes no difference what is the nature of the report or through what channel it comes, I cannot allow myself to be troubled with any items about such things. If I should say anything on it I would be expected to speak, and I can see no end to it. We had tried to make it a rule to endeavor to keep the public informed as to what I have to say, and and if I should make an exception to that I should only up newspaper reports every morning, and say this is true, or that is not true.

"Any statement may go on with your own opinion as to what you think will be done, but I must not be asked to confirm or deny reports that we get to circulation. I say this in all kindness, but I hope it will be understood all around that I will not allow myself to be placed in a position of determining the trustworthiness of any report, no matter how important or from what source it comes."

No one, can be found, of those about Gen. Harrison, and likely to know, who place any credence whatever in the reported tender of the state portfolio to Mr. Blaine

By JOHN STRANGE WINTER.

Jim could not help smiling as he remembered Tommy's pointedly absent air on the evening before poor dear old Owen's funeral at Walmesbury.

'The poor young lumper is not holding his head high, I fancy,' he said, presently, 'he said gravely. 'Well, for the sake of your father, we can leave his punishment to a higher. Will that satisfy?'

'It is possible that you have any pity for him?' she said, incredulously.

'Yes, I think I have,' Jim answered. 'It is my bright nature to have mercy on poor mind that he doesn't look as if he found it so.

'Ah! you don't know him,' Nancy cried. 'I do. He is like an India rubber ball—which you hold him tight to be crushed and quiet for ever, without your grip of him, and he is full of freshness and life. If he knows that you know I can well be sure that he is humble and abject to you. That has been his way out of difficulty and danger ever since he was a boy—a baby, but now that he is out of your sight, I would not mind staking my very life that he is flirting with one of the Leslie girls at this moment.

But at this moment—and Jim smiling gaily—if you would be very accurate, that is—but likely enough he is thinking about it.

She flushed up angrily all over her fair face.

'I can not understand you,' she cried. 'He was your friend, your best friend—and yet you willingly let his assassin go free—you——'

'Don't you understand that your brother is sacred to me?' Jim asked gravely. 'For himself for his sake I would not have held my hand one moment, and he knows it. Right willingly and cheerfully would I see him hanged to-morrow—nay this very day.'

Nancy shuddered at the dreadful word but she did not attempt to speak and Jim went on.

'But he is your brother—that made him safe from me in the first instance. Now comes your father and shows me such trust and generosity. I could not betray him or sign to save my own life, even than it would be a hard task for me to be compelled to speak.

'And that poor heavy broke down also—gallant as I began to very jaunty and passionately. And remember Jim got his arms round her again and drew her head down upon his breast soothing her as if she were a weary child in distress.

'There there, my darling, don't cry so,' he murmured. 'At least let us wait a little while and see what happens. We are young, and it may only be a little time to wait and if we love one another always it will seem no part and it is not as if we were to be kept apart altogether.'

'Is it so hard,' she sighed, 'and are you to be under this hideous suspicion while he dances about as the lion of the season? And as my father to part all his friends and faith in his loyalty and honour in his child? Oh! I know how good, how unselfish you are Jim to do this but it is a cruel deception on an old man—it is wicked. I am sure no good will ever come of it. And what am I to say if—if—oh! I mean when they say that you did it? And people will say it, Jim! I know it.'

'But I am saying it won't make it true,' he said quietly. 'And after all you can always say that you believe in me you know. And Nancy my dear love do you think that I shall ever forget that when all the world might have been justified in being against me you were my own brave and hearted darling who believed in me apart from all the evidence that seemed to be against me? Do you think that I shall ever forget that? Oh! my love, my darling how little do you realise what my love for you is if you can think so for a moment.'

And that Beautiful Jim won the day and in the battle against his own interests against all that would have [illegible] that day and after a little [illegible] that day and after a little [illegible] Nancy got over her first burst of indignation against torying Tommy and [illegible] and collected. And [illegible] she was not the sure able to realise [illegible] that would be hard [illegible] when she had [illegible] for her own.

[illegible] and in a [illegible] there [illegible] Jim that you need never ask me [illegible] Tommy [illegible] as long [illegible] acknowledge himself as my [illegible] When we go back to Bloomsbury [illegible] Jim said [illegible] I love [illegible] and that so far as is necessary [illegible] father I believe to have no [illegible] I have always been, but out of my father's presence he must not only understand that he is for the future dead to me. [illegible] understand—unmistakably as you know—plain to him that [illegible] for my father's sake and for it alone but I have not yet [illegible] I am to have any dealings with a criminal he must that absolutely clear to him and tell him that I am bound by no promise of secrecy—and if he in the unlikely way presumes upon the knowledge that we wish to keep to from my father I shall have another handsome nor compunction in speaking out at once.

'Very well' Jim make it clear to him said Jim quietly.

And presently she asked him to tell her the minute details of the terrible event and after a good deal of persuasion Jim consented and did so. Then for the first time she learned all there was to know about Rose Mocking the bad maid at the Dukes Teal and the part which she had taken in the tragedy.

'I must see her' she said. 'I must do something for her I wonder what it is possible I can do! She must be a good woman a very good woman or she would have used her knowledge to marry him before this. Anyway I must see her. It will not be easy unless she comes to town but it must be managed somehow.'

It was not very long after this that Mr. Earle returned from his club in the truth he told in a very uneasy frame of mind for it the manner in which Nancy might have taken his decision. He went into the room where they still were together and Jim got up with a sort of apology for his presence.

'I am here still' he said by way of excuse. 'You see we had a good deal to talk over and——'

'As long as you take as long as you like my dear fellow' the old man cried. 'I am really very glad.'

'Father' broke in Nancy. 'I want to say something. I have never disobeyed you in my life yet I want you to give me my way here. I shall never marry any other man but this—laying her hand on

'I shall never marry any other man.'

Jim's arm. and although we will wait for your consent to our marriage I must be able and free to see him as often as I like.'

Just at first he had not been inclined to avail himself of the privileges which it afforded him, he had been dazed and crushed by events which had happened so suddenly, and had moreover suffered a good deal from beautiful Jim a continued absence.

Somehow he never quite seemed able to get out of sight of the searching look in Jim's eyes, or from the cordial tones in the voice, or from the cordial meetings he, [illegible] that he felt.

[illegible] thought of this or that [illegible] he had experienced such a positive [illegible] the events in the [illegible] he felt [illegible] he felt [illegible] have taken the decision. He went into the room where they still were together and Jim got up with a sort of apology for his presence.
